On October 9, the Dutch and Nigerian subsidiaries^[1] of Italian Eni have filed a request for arbitration at ICSID.^[2] The dispute revolves around Shell and Eni's 2011 purchase of the Oil Prospecting Licence ("OPL 245") from the company Malabu Oil and Gas Limited ("Malabu") for USD $1.3 Billion. Malabu, an entity controlled by Nigerian businessmen was the original awardee of the OPL 245 oil block, an ultra-deep offshore petroleum block in Nigerian waters. Shell formed part of the oil prospecting deals, but it is not a claimant in this filing. It is worth noting that in 2011 Shell settled an ICSID case against Nigeria for the alleged expropriation of Shell's right to OPL 245.^[3]

Eni is bringing this ICSID dispute after the Federal Republic of Nigeria, (FRN), brought corruption cases against Eni. The FRN filed two suits asserting corruption offenses tied to OPL 245 before courts in Milan^[4] and Nigeria.^[5] Asset freezing actions were also commenced in the United Kingdom^[6]

regarding funds related to OPL 245.[\[7\]](#)

It was reported that Eni is making at least two claims in the ICSID case. First, the impropriety of the corruption allegations. Second, the denial to convert the Oil Prospecting License into an Oil Mining License (“OML”) as a breach of the 1992 Netherlands Nigeria BIT.

Eni has already contended the impropriety of the corruption allegations in its press releases, thereby signalling the claims to come before ICSID. As such, Eni indicated seven key arguments, inter alia that: (i) OPL 245 brings benefits to the FRN; (ii) the cost of operation of OPL 245 was fair and reasonable; (iii) Eni made the payment directly to the FRN; (iv) Eni was unaware of Malabu’s use of the funds; (v) the broker in the deal did not act on behalf of Eni; (vi) Eni’s senior management received no bribe; and (vii) Eni complied with the audit procedures.[\[8\]](#)

Additionally, Eni has requested discovery of documents in the US against two investment management funds regarding their alleged involvement in the OPL. The investors have retained the boutique Three Crowns, whilst counsel for Nigeria has not been announced.
