Despite private investment comprising only 14% of Africa's climate finance, Mene called for greater private-sector leadership in renewable energy, waste management, and agriculture. He reaffirmed AfCFTA's commitment to supporting a climate-resilient, inclusive economic transformation.

The government of Kenya has officially terminated its bilateral investment treaty (BIT) with the Netherlands, marking a significant win for economic justice and environmental protection. According to the Dutch Minister for Foreign Trade and Development, Kenya unilaterally ended the treaty in December 2023, rendering it inoperative from 11 June 2024. Kenya now joins South Africa, Tanzania, and Burkina Faso as the fourth African country to terminate its BIT with the Netherlands. It also aligns with international efforts to reform investment policies to better support sustainable development goals and climate action, both of which Kenya has committed to under international frameworks.

Turkey Offered BRICS Partner Status Amid Geopolitical Strategy

Trade Minister Ömer Bolat described the status as a transitional phase in BRICS' structure, following President Erdoğan's participation in a summit hosted by Russia. Turkish officials view BRICS as a means to enhance economic cooperation without replacing Western alliances, though the partner status may fall short of Turkey's full membership ambitions. This reflects Ankara's broader strategy to balance relationships between Eastern and Western powers for greater geopolitical and economic influence.

Acting Chinese Consul General Jin Mingyu highlighted the partnership's success, emphasizing multinational cooperation in port and logistics development and increased Nigerian exports to China. All Africa reports that at COP29 in Baku, African countries are emphasizing the urgent need for ambitious and transparent climate finance goals to address severe climate impacts that cost up to 5% of the continent's GDP annually. To implement Nationally Determined Contributions (NDCs), Africa requires over $2.5 trillion annually by 2030, highlighting the need for reliable public international financing as grants from developed nations under the Paris Agreement. Kenya's Ambassador Ali Mohamed criticized imbalanced proposals on climate finance, reiterating Africa's demand for fair and substantial funding for adaptation, mitigation, and loss and damage, including reforms to global financial systems. China's Zero-Tariff Plan for African LDCs Faces Skepticism China's decision to eliminate tariffs on goods from least developed countries (LDCs), including 33 in Africa, has been met with skepticism from analysts, who view it as more beneficial to China than Africa reports All Africa. Announced by President Xi Jinping at the 2024 Forum on China-Africa Cooperation, the plan aims to enhance African exports but faces structural challenges, such as limited diversification and quality standards in African economies. Analysts see the move as an attempt to rival U.S. influence in Africa, leveraging dissatisfaction with restrictive U.S. trade policies like AGOA. Critics argue the initiative primarily advances China's geopolitical goals, offering limited economic benefits to African countries. Despite China's framing of the plan as fostering South-South solidarity, experts like Emmanuel Owusu-Sekyere caution that structural bottlenecks and nontariff barriers may hinder African nations from capitalizing on the opportunity.

ASYCUDA: A Quiet Catalyst for Greener Global Trade

All Africa reports that as the global community anticipates COP29, practical initiatives like ASYCUDA are demonstrating measurable progress in greening international trade. Developed by UNCTAD, ASYCUDA digitizes customs procedures in over 100 countries, reducing paper use, cutting emissions, and boosting trade efficiency. For instance, Angola reduced paper consumption by 70%, and Tonga lowered maritime transport emissions by 14% using the system. Beyond digitization, ASYCUDA enhances logistics, reduces customs delays, and supports environmental enforcement, such as tracking ozone-depleting substances and endangered species trade. By combining technological innovation with environmental stewardship, ASYCUDA exemplifies how small, scalable solutions can address climate challenges and foster sustainable trade systems globally.

Trump's Return Sparks Uncertainty Over US-Kenya Trade Talks

According to All Africa, former US President Donald Trump's potential return to the White House has created uncertainty around US-Kenya trade negotiations revived under President Biden. Biden's administration launched a strategic trade partnership with Kenya in 2021, replacing formal talks initiated by Trump in 2020, with discussions focused on agriculture, digital trade, climate action, and trade facilitation. While officials aimed to finalize the deal before the US presidential election, Trump's approach to trade with Kenya—whether to revert to his earlier agenda, continue Biden's framework, or abandon talks altogether—remains unclear. Kenya, a key regional ally and the second-largest AGOA beneficiary, plays a significant role in US-Africa relations, making the outcome of these trade negotiations critical for both nations.

AGOA Renewal Uncertainty Looms Over African Exports

South African citrus growers and other African exporters face uncertainty as the African Growth and Opportunity Act (AGOA) nears expiration in 2025, with President-elect Donald Trump vowing to impose tariffs on imports reports Barron's. AGOA currently grants duty-free access to 1,800 products from 32 African countries, benefiting industries like citrus, textiles, and automotive parts in South Africa, Kenya, Ghana, and Nigeria. If AGOA is withdrawn or modified, industries could see significant impacts, including job losses and revenue cuts, with South Africa's citrus industry potentially losing over $55 million in export revenue. Analysts expect changes to AGOA, such as stricter rules of origin or a scaled-back version, but warn African economies must prepare for volatile U.S. trade policies. Countries with strong geopolitical ties to Russia or China, like South Africa, could face additional challenges navigating U.S. trade relations.

SA's New U.S. Ambassador Calls for Economic Diplomacy Amid Changing Relations

According to The Witness, South Africa's new ambassador to the U.S., Ebrahim Rasool, has urged a shift toward "economic diplomacy" to protect the country's economic interests amidst potential tensions with the incoming Trump administration. While affirming South Africa's strong stance on human rights, Rasool emphasized the importance of fostering mutual understanding and securing continued participation in initiatives like the African Growth and Opportunity Act (AGOA), which grants duty-free access for certain SA exports. Concerns linger over South Africa's ties with China and Russia, as well as its position on global conflicts, which previously drew criticism from U.S. Congress. As South Africa prepares to assume the G20 presidency on December 1, priorities include global financing, food security, and climate change. Government officials remain optimistic about strengthening U.S.-SA relations under the new administration to advance shared goals and preserve trade benefits.

Kenya Introduces New Bills Amid Financial and Social Struggles

According to African Law and Business, the Kenyan government has proposed the Tax Laws (Amendment) Bill and the Business Laws (Amendment) Bill to address its financial crisis after scrapping the controversial Finance Bill 2024. These new bills aim to widen the tax base and increase revenues to manage rising debt but make few substantive changes to address public grievances, particularly among the youth, who led riots earlier this year over high living costs and increased taxation. The bills target high-revenue sectors like alcohol and cigarettes through excise duties, seen as both a deterrent and a reliable revenue source. Minor adjustments include raising non-taxable benefits and pension contribution limits, but critics argue they fall short of easing the broader tax burden. With the bills at the first reading stage, stakeholders and citizens are urged to voice their concerns to Parliament to influence the final legislation.

Nigeria Launches Review of Bilateral Investment Treaties

The review builds on the framework established by the 2016 Nigeria-Morocco BIT and includes an examination of the Nigerian Investment Promotion Commission Act of 2004. Prince Fagbemi emphasized the importance of BITs in attracting foreign direct investment, providing legal protections for investors, and fostering economic growth, while noting the need to adapt to changing global economic conditions.
